This double issue of the Harvard Theological Review is dedicated to the Society of Biblical Literature, which celebrates its centennial this year. All essays in this volume have been contributed by faculty members and alumni of Harvard University. Members of this university and their students have been active in the Society of Biblical Literature from its beginning in the year 1880, have contributed to biblical scholarship through their publications and served in various functions in the Society. The contributions in this volume also express our gratitude to the Society of Biblical Literature, since it has provided opportunities for exchange and critical discourse in the community of scholars nationwide and with scholars from other countries. The essays of this volume seek to be a symbol of Harvard's continuing commitment to the field of biblical studies multos in annos.
